KMT's Lien Chan endorsed the Government's policy of rapid economic development for Taiwan. He opposed party chairman Chiang Ching-kuo's war with mainland China. Chan also criticized the democratization reforms that occurred after the end of the martial law era. Lien also disagreed with the KMT's having only 55 representatives in the first-ever democratically-elected Taiwanese legislature: "The KMT, as the only party that participated in the election, should not have less members than other parties." His party wanted a stricter ratification of the Kaohsiung and Shanghai accords. Second retirement In June 1985, Lien retired to his luxury residence in Taipei, a mansion built by Japanese colonial rulers on a plot in the neighbourhood of Beitou. He refused to make a political comeback. He started to speak and write less and, at times, spoke with a faint stutter. He seemed to have hidden his health problems, and his wife and daughter Maizhi were the only ones to know about his weakness. Lien filed his retirement papers in July 1985. In December of the same year, he announced his retirement from politics. At the age of 70, he became the first party leader to retire from the KMT. Personal life Family Lien was born into a family of Kaiping businessmen. His father Lien Shou-an (1912 – 1990) was a merchant who established the Kaiping Bank in 1933. His younger brother Lien Tsu-an (born 1938), who played a notable role in the Chinese Democratic Party as its first chairman, was also elected to the Legislative Yuan. A third brother, Lien Chi-chen (born 1938), was a businessman and environmentalist. Lien's brother-in-law 648931e174
