My father was a schoolteacher, and my mother a housewife. I had lived in a small, rural community, and I had grown up in a home where rules and regulations were not just accepted but encouraged. As a law student at Dalhousie University in Halifax, my specialty was public law, and I was fascinated by the history of English Canada. The Canada I was studying had been built on the foundation of the British common law. It was a lawyer's paradise, and the law faculties in the U.S., the U.K., Europe and Australia were all studying it. I was only the second Canadian to get a Rhodes scholarship to study at Oxford. When I graduated and returned to my hometown of Winnipeg, I began an exciting career in law, practising corporate and commercial law. I was proud of the fact that I was paid well, but I was also quite frustrated at what I felt was a lack of opportunity in my career. Despite being a lawyer, I never felt as if I had the time, money or access to the resources needed to be able to practise in a meaningful way in my chosen field. So I decided to become a notary public, a profession not a lot of people know exists, and which makes no demands upon the lawyer. Notary publics like me are able to practise in the private sector without a license, although there are certain restricted functions for which they are required to be licensed. But what I felt was the potential in a profession I had been trained in, and which had a shortage of practitioners, was too 2d92ce491b
