The Pan-Canadian Study of Acute Myocardial Infarction (PASSI-AMI) will study the management and outcomes of patients with acute myocardial infarction (AMI) across Canada. This study will be an important source of data for AMI guidelines, education, and audit/improvement of practice. To ascertain the feasibility of using crowdsourcing as a viable method to collect nationwide data for this study, we developed an online smartphone application (APP) that assesses the quality of AMI care across Canada. We solicited the services of thousands of Canadian citizens who have a smartphone to create a consensus-based APP. Data from 10,000 completed assessments were collected and analyzed. After 5 months of use, the APP was positively accepted by citizens, with 99.0% of the population actively engaging with it. Most individuals spent fewer than 5 min completing assessments (mean: 17.5 min), and they completed approximately 3 assessments during the study. National estimates of diagnostic (99.7%) and treatment (97.1%) processes were accurate, but most important processes (99.8%) were estimated to be accurate. The APP is a feasible and acceptable method for assessing the quality of AMI care and will be used in PASSI-AMI.Q: what are the advantages of using prototype inheritance in javascript? I have been using prototype inheritance (super or obj.__proto__ = object) but not getting the advantages. what are the benefits of this? A: To go more into detail then, super is used to get to the "real" prototype (and so it's common to say the "real" prototype is Object.prototype.__proto__). That means that a function can have a lot of inheritance without having to call Object.create(Object.prototype.__proto__,...); Inheritance is also used a lot in JS to "exploit" native objects, like Array. And here's an example from the MDN: function fn () { this.a = 0; } function SuperFn

() { fn.call(this, "super"); // Assign it to a new object Super
