The idea behind the approach is to examine a student-athlete's drinking motivation, and then provide the student-athlete with information designed to reduce that motivation. We plan to demonstrate the intervention's effectiveness by comparing the intervention group, which received a psycho-educational approach, with a control group, which did not. The intervention is designed to increase the student-athlete's awareness of alcohol's effects on his body, knowledge of the behavioral consequences of drinking, and the stigma of alcohol use. All student-athletes at Kansas State University will be given the same intervention. The control group will be asked to complete a survey and respond to questions. The intervention group will be asked to complete the survey and respond to questions, as well as participate in either a modified mini-workshop or a seminar. Both groups will then be asked to complete a survey at the end of the semester. The study will have two phases: Phase I will be a pre-test to determine the baseline level of the students' knowledge regarding alcohol's effects, drinking patterns, and the personal and social consequences of using alcohol. Phase II will be a posttest to examine the change in student-athletes' knowledge and beliefs regarding alcohol after the intervention, compared to the baseline. If the intervention can be demonstrated to be effective, it will be applied to collegiate athletes across the nation. It could potentially be offered to athletes at the beginning of their collegiate careers, thus giving them the opportunity to learn the risks of alcohol use during their college years. This intervention would then be available to them in their off-season training program, and be employed to encourage their continued abstinence.
