The proliferating cell nuclear antigen (PCNA) is a general marker of proliferating cells. In order to explore the relation between the expression of PCNA and the biological behavior of gastric cancer, the expression of PCNA was studied in the tumor tissue of 41 cases of gastric cancer by the streptavidin biotin peroxidase method. We found that PCNA was expressed mainly in the nucleus of gastric cancer cell, and the positive rate was significantly higher than that of normal gastric mucosa. The PCNA expression was associated with the invasion depth of cancer cell, the degree of histological differentiation, and the lymph node metastasis of gastric cancer. We also found that the PCNA expression in metastatic lymph node was higher than that in primary lesion, although the difference was not statistically significant. It is suggested that PCNA might be a useful parameter in the evaluation of malignancy of gastric cancer.
