Laparoscopic cholecystectomy has become a standard surgical procedure for symptomatic cholelithiasis. We describe a series of 509 patients who underwent a laparoscopic cholecystectomy, from November 1993 to December 1995. The patient population consisted of 183 males and 326 females with a mean age of 40 years (range 17 to 77). Most of the patients (48.5%) had no risk factors for cholelithiasis. The most common symptom was abdominal pain, found in 396 patients (78.4%). Follow-up was performed in all patients, with a mean period of 11 months. The perioperative mortality was 1.6% and the overall morbidity 2.3%. Our data show that laparoscopic cholecystectomy is safe and effective in patients with symptomatic cholelithiasis without risk factors.Postembryonic development of the vertebrate neural tube and neural crest: specific functions of head ectoderm in Xenopus laevis. In Xenopus laevis embryos, the dorsal lip of the blastopore, the site where the neural plate is initially formed, is soon covered by the dorsal ectoderm. We report on the effects of removing the dorsal ectoderm during gastrula stages on the formation of the neural tube and neural crest and show that the head ectoderm is required for the development of both neural tissues. Removal of the head ectoderm leads to a ventral shift of the ventral axis and to a general shortening of the axes, with less than half the normal number of axis pairs. In contrast, removal of the dorsal ectoderm leads to complete duplication of the neural tube with the anterior and posterior regions displaced medially. The dorsal ectoderm appears to play a role in establishing left/right differences during gastrula stages.
