Change File Extension Shell Menu Cracked 2022 Latest Version Screenshots:Q: AngularJS $apply vs $scope.$apply I was just wondering how angular is supposed to be used in an MVC way - how to properly update the model of the controller. I've seen examples using $apply and $scope.$apply and they appear to do the same thing. So basically if you are using $scope.$apply you are updating the model of the scope, and if you use $apply you are updating the model of the controller? I know the difference between the two is that one only updates the scope and the other updates both, but why would you ever do that? A: You should only use $apply when the async call returns data to update the model, or if the controller is returning data that needs to be bound to the view. Otherwise, you should just use the $scope.$apply and let angular handle the model update. Here's an example: $scope.model = { someProperty: 'foo' }; $scope.$apply(); // updates the model angular.module('myModule', []) .controller('MyCtrl', function($scope) { $scope.model = { someProperty: 'bar' }; }); This will update the model as expected: Or, to update the model immediately, use $scope.$evalAsync(): $scope.model.someProperty = 'bar'; $scope.$evalAsync(); The difference between $scope.$apply and $scope.$evalAsync is what happens when the $digest phase fires. $scope.$evalAsync runs the function synchronously and when angular unifies the view state, it then runs the $digest phase, which updates the model. The former method updates the model in the current digest cycle. The later method updates the model on the next digest cycle. How to Repair the Ship If you have ever had to
