This paper summarizes our experience with self-induced trauma and psychological responses. Patients who have self-induced trauma experience a variety of psychological responses including a state of psychopathology, a transient or permanent diminution of functioning, and psychological factors contributing to death. The authors discuss the origins and possible benefits of each response. The psychological response of self-induced trauma appears to be independent of the following variables: degree of injury to the body; type of injury, i.e. sharp vs blunt; site of injury; and physical condition of the patient. The psychological response to self-induced trauma may be similar to that seen in other clinical situations (e.g. combat veterans, victims of disasters, etc.) where negative psychological reactions are observed. In a group of 130 patients who had self-induced trauma, 14 had medical complications which included infections of the wound (6), excessive self-care practices (7), hypoglycemia (2), and inappropriate use of intravenous fluids (1). The psychological responses to
