As the head of IT at a mid-sized construction company, Cary oversees the organization's network of developers, engineers and testers. Before Cary was responsible for all the application releases. Now, as the Release Manager for Wrike, he's responsible for managing the quality of the apps that Wrike sends to its users. His team of 21 support engineers make sure Wrike runs smoothly and consistently. "With about 1.8 million users around the world, Wrike is the clear leader in remote work management software." Cary's managed to do this not only by spending the right time developing quality releases, but also by creating an environment that gets the best out of his developers. He works both with the Project Managers in the company to get their projects off the ground and while they're in development, and also with the individual Developers to drive the Wrike release cycle. Cary leads a team of 11 software developers. He shares how he uses Wrike to streamline his work while making his team more effective. Wrike respects your privacy and does not sell, rent or give your personal information to any third parties. This is why Wrike has a professional service that ensures that the information you share with us will be kept private and confidential. As the Release Manager for Wrike, I ensure quality releases go out to our users at the right time and on time.
