Living in the '80s definitely made me into a different type of boy, one who thinks doing homework in the hallway all day really isn't so bad, and that, if it all goes too well, you can always rush back downstairs. One day, we got caught doing some homework in the hallway, and a teacher, as most teachers probably do when they catch you, immediately had us check into the basement, where our would-be-inner-spy status was ensured until the next morning, when we were forced to go to the gynecology wing. (We made him kick us out.) The next time we were caught, he just marked us absent, but when I came back home hours later, I found out I had to return to the gynecology wing the next day, because on the back of my report card, the teacher wrote that I had spied on him and reported him to the dean of the school. (School officials weren't even sure what the word "spy" even meant; it was as if he came up with it on his own, as if he had a problem with his sexuality, which, as my mom would remind me, was probably the only thing wrong with him.) This, sadly, was one of many moments where I learned that just because you're given the "C" doesn't mean the world is going to be better for you. It's normal to want to avoid that ring of shame, the (usually) fake report card. It's normal to want to run from the humiliation. But I'm reminded of an anecdote that I remember hearing from friends when I was younger. The story goes something like this: Guy turns to his girlfriend and says, "I can't believe what happened to me today." Girl: "What?" Guy: "Well, I was walking home from school and I was talking to this girl I've been seeing for a while. Just chatting with her. Anyway, when we got to the corner, I told her I lived around here and she told me her apartment was just down the street. So I said, 'Let's just walk together, so we can get to your building and go upstairs and talk for a while.' But then I started to walk faster. When we got to the corner, I heard her call after me,

1,600 Kids Who Make it to Surgery Alive Children are benefiting from a program that provides them with pediatric surgery, state-of-the-art medical technology and expert surgeon care. In 2014, more than 1,600 children survived their initial surgeries at the Children's Hospital at Holy Cross, a reflection of the partnership between the healthcare system and MetroMass, an independent health care system serving more than 100,000 residents in the suburbs of Boston. The program - funded by an anonymous donor at MetroMass - provides surgeries from the hospital's state-of-the-art hospital facilities in cases that would have otherwise not been afforded such care. The program also has a unique cadre of surgeons who provide expertise in pediatric surgery, including those who work with the program's first surgeon, Dr. Gregory Andrews. Andrews is an expert in dozens of areas of surgery, from organ transplants to pediatric and adult heart surgery. He said the greatest impact of providing pediatric surgery through the program has been the improvement in procedures and the quality of care that is provided. "Kids are better off because they come in, and they get the best surgeons and the best technology," Andrews said. A doctor with MetroMass for nearly 20 years, Andrews said the program is distinct because it focuses on children who are not able to provide consent, and not on life-and-death cases. About two-thirds of the children who are treated at the hospital receive care through the program. The difference in outcome is significant, the surgeon said. "In surgeries for tumors, for example, the average age in the United States is eight years old, but we are doing surgery for children down to one-and-a-half years old," Andrews said. One of the biggest benefits of the program is that it provides medical attention to children in the Boston area who otherwise wouldn't have it, he said. "We treat kids that are too young to travel," Andrews said. While the typical patient stays in the hospital for about a week, the charity programs have allowed many of the children to come home within 24 hours or less. Many of the children who have survived their surgeries have gone on to do great things in their lives, Andrews said. "To see an 8-year-old make it and have such a strong recovery, it
