Microscopy and microscopy systems are widely used in conjunction with different industries, such as biotechnology, biochemistry, electronics, optoelectronics, and semiconductor. There are three conventional categories of microscopy: light microscopy, electron microscopy and scanning electron microscopy (SEM), all of which are widely used. SEM has high magnification and good resolution; however, high cost and complicated procedures are drawbacks of SEM. Accordingly, microscopy used in biotechnology, biochemistry, electronics and semiconductor industries is primarily light microscopy. The basic concept of light microscopy is that the image of a sample is focused through an objective lens onto the surface of a glass slide, and the light
