An experiment where electrical current is used to stimulate muscles directly may one day allow paralyzed patients to walk again. The technique is called functional electrical stimulation (FES). Scientists from the University of Cambridge in the UK have used the technology to stimulate just two of the muscles used in walking in monkeys. The findings, published in the journal Nature Medicine today, suggest it could be possible to treat human patients in just a few years. Functional electrical stimulation is used in sports like cycling and wheelchair basketball and helps people with spinal injuries. It is also being explored as a therapy for stroke patients, who have a tendency to fall if their leg muscles are weak. Researchers have already been able to find signals from muscles connected to the brain by implanting electrodes under the skin, and are currently developing electrodes implanted into the brain. In FES, electrodes are implanted into muscle and electrical current is used to stimulate them. The key breakthrough was putting electrodes into each of the muscles involved in moving the leg, but not attaching them to any nerves or blood vessels to stop the current from affecting the brain. "This is different from brain stimulation. The electrical current is not going into the brain but into
