This guide will guide you through a typical remapping process. It will provide a basic overview of remapping and of the components used in a typical remapping (see Features below for detailed information). Remapping is usually the first step for many players. It gives them the opportunity to increase the number of options available to them. The definitions of mapping and remapping are: Mapping: A process of measuring the sounds of an instrument in order to produce new sounds that are 'better' than those that currently exist. Remapping: Using a technique that is designed to produce new sounds that are more pleasing than those that currently exist. Parts of the system used to produce sounds with a keyboard include: The keyboad: An input device that is used to produce the sounds. A physical keyboard is often used, but an electronic version may also be used. The microphone: A device that detects the sounds made by the keys that the keyboard 'emulates'. This means that the notes that the keyboard is producing are not identical to the sounds that the keys make (i.e. the actual sound that the keys are producing) but are based on 'sounds' that can be produced by those keys. The computer software: The system that takes the signals produced by the keyboard and processes them. By taking the audio signal and reducing it to a low level of detail (for example, at a much lower level than normal human hearing), the software can detect individual sounds or a combination of sounds and then identify which one of these sounds is produced by a particular key. A key example of what happens during remapping is a piano. When you press a key on the piano, the keys vibrate. The vibrations of the keys are picked up by the microphone and converted into electrical signals. When these signals are sent to the software, the software will recognise the pattern of the vibration. It will then calculate how many of these vibrations are present. Usually, the software will calculate how many of the vibrations are from a single key. This calculation will be the basis for each note that is being played. For example, the software will know that when a key is pressed, a sound will be produced. The software will then determine the number of vibrations that are caused by this key and will assign the highest number to this key. If a new key is pressed, then it may produce a sound with a lower number of vibrations than the previous key
