as to do just as he said in the article: Allowing the president to decide which provisions of a law apply to him would be unprecedented, for example. It also raises constitutional concerns because it would mean that the president can unilaterally amend laws to add or subtract substantive provisions. Also, I think it's irrelevant that the president is a Republican: because, while some presidents are more transparent than others, it doesn't change that, in fact, the president signed a bill with a presidential signing statement that says he is obligated to veto it because of the section above, but then he has not vetoed it anyway and the executive orders on the matter have been issued. It's also worth noting that there are other ways to get rid of the ACA than through the president's executive orders: the GOP has majority control in the Senate and can and should block the ACA (and the whole thing will be thrown out anyway). Another option would be to split the bill up into smaller parts, which could get rid of some of the non-ACA parts. Alex: In response to Jarasquall: Here's the quote from the ACA that you are quoting: Quote: And if the Supreme Court concludes, for example, that the penalty is in fact a tax, but finds the individual mandate unconstitutional under a Commerce Clause analysis, the IRS may not levy, collect or penalize tax that is attributable to covered individuals' failure to purchase insurance that meets the mandatory requirements of the law. You cite the Supreme Court's reference to the mandate as part of the penalty. That's not exactly what they said. They reference it as part of the requirement to carry insurance, which is a duty not to be penalized under ObamaCare. Once they have established the mandate as unconstitutional, they rule that the entire law is unconstitutional, and throw the whole thing out. In any case, the claim that Congress is now empowered to pass whatever laws they like in response to a decision by the Supreme Court is laughable. The Constitution does not provide for any such thing. In fact, the first provision of Article III says: Quote: The Judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time
