The data covers 385 occupations across 175 countries and gives the sense of 'life time' or 'until retirement'. Synthesis of isotopically labeled SAMHD1 variants and their application for NMR structure determination. SAMHD1 is a dGTP-specific 5'-nucleosidase involved in nucleotide metabolism and innate antiviral immunity. SAMHD1 is ubiquitously expressed in the majority of cells and mutations in the gene lead to adult onset Aicardi-Goutieres syndrome. SAMHD1 has no known catalytic residues or substrate binding site, and the structure of the protein is unknown. We developed an enzymatic approach to the incorporation of isotopic labels into SAMHD1 to facilitate the structure determination of this protein. Our method is based on ligation of peptide fragments and subsequently allows the direct incorporation of natural and isotopically labeled amino acids into native SAMHD1 protein. To evaluate the method, we synthesized isotopically labeled SAMHD1 variants with the functionality of wild type protein, expressed them in bacteria and isolated them by affinity chromatography. The obtained variants were used for NMR structure determination. Our enzymatic method allows the direct incorporation of isolated and unlabeled proteins into site-specific labeled variants, and has several advantages over previously used protein expression-based and chemical proteolysis-based methods. A single micrometastatic tumor cell can stimulate solid tumor growth in the adjacent tissue, a process called the seed and soil hypothesis. Our preliminary data show that the pre-implantation tumor, the metastatic tumor cell and the adjacent tissue all support tumor growth. We propose the following hypothesis: that the tumor is seeded into the lung by the pre-implantation tumor, and grows in the lung in response to growth factors secreted from the pre-implantation tumor and by
