I'm working with a responsive website and I want to introduce: Fluid Layout for mobile screens, where all my elements are responsive (wrap to the width of the container) Strictly-fixed layout for larger screens, where elements with different widths should be aligned correctly. (so nothing like float:left) Is there a good way to do this? For example I could define more widths for some elements, but I'm not sure if this is the way to go. A: Is there a good way to do this? Yes, there are many ways to achieve such layouts. The ideal solution for you depends on some details, such as: How many different sizes of layout do you need? How much difference in size do you want between them? How many different lengths of layout? Ideally, you would have two background colors or images, for small screens and large screens respectively. Apply different background-positioning properties to each of them, via media queries. With a lot of HTML and CSS, this is far from a complete answer, but hopefully it helps you move in the right direction. How can I use Media Queries in CSS? A computer, an online computer, or a hardware or software computer is a machine that stores data and manipulates data according to programmed instructions, and provides the end-user, also known as a person who interacts with a computer, with a human-machine interface. A modern computer is a microcomputer that is designed to be controllable by a human operator. A computer may be described as a data processing device that accepts data, manipulates data in accordance with programs, and provides the results of processing as output. While this simple definition may not cover some special cases, this definition is used in common parlance, for example, in the film industry and in the gaming industry. Also, a computing device will be referred to as a computer, computer program, or simply a computer when the scope of discussion makes it clear that the device contains a program, regardless of whether or not that program is altered by the operator. When referring to both a desktop computer and a laptop computer, for example, the term computer is used inclusively. If a device contains a desktop computer (with its monitor, keyboard, mouse, and other input/output devices), it will be called a desktop computer or a personal computer. Otherwise, it will be called a laptop, netbook, or other name. Many homes today depend on computers to perform functions such as electricity bill payment, scheduling appointments, online banking, and shopping. However, a significant number of people do not use computers for such tasks. The computer revolution that began around the 1960s has since revolutionized the world, but it is still not uniformly adopted. Although the term "computer" is commonly used as a noun that refers to the physical machine, it is also used as a verb to refer to information processing performed by a machine, including a special-purpose computer. The verb thus does not imply that the machine is connected to a network; rather, it just implies that information is processed. The advantages of a computer over paper-based information systems include:

- Computers can be applied to any task that can be expressed as a list of instructions; if the instructions are unambiguous and detailed enough, it will be possible to create a computer program to do almost anything. This is especially true if the program is already available for most of the computer-related applications.
- Computers are not subject to human error. This is especially important when a paper-based information system is involved, as very often the simplest and most direct
