It uses one of many speech engines to read the words from any webpages that contain text, and does a pretty good job at it. Now, don't expect to hear a captivating Attenborough-esque voice-over reading Wikipedia entries, but you're still going to get text to speech at probably the best quality available. A window will pop up when you click the extension, giving you basic playback controls, but also highlighting the text that is being read. The latter is a feature that you can disable if you want to rest your eyes and just listen to the words; also, the window's design is nothing pretty to look at, so you're probably better off with just the playback controls. A really useful extension You can choose from many voices that are basically speech engines developed by the likes of

Google, Amazon and Microsoft (although not all of them are free). You can even use Google Translate's engines to make the extension read articles in many languages other than English and actually pronounce every word correctly. To conclude, Read Aloud is a great tool for people who are too tired to read web content (or just don't feel like it), but also for people who have difficulty reading, like those with dyslexia or other learning disabilities. You can use it for just about any type of information that you want, whether it's a name, or a phone number, or even just an idea of what you're thinking about. But one thing that you may not realize is that you can use Evernote to help you with your work. Writing, drawing, note taking, and even taking pictures, Evernote will do it all for you, for free! You can use the tool to help organize your thoughts, and then use Evernote to turn your information

This tool was able to do the job for us well and accurately. We liked that it was able to use any dictionary and let it run in the background and for that reason, we often use it. We like that it's not a standalone program, but rather an extension to Google Chrome and hence the speed it gives us, we don't have to wait and on a really busy website, even a big one, it usually loads rather quickly.
