Bilateral radiation-induced meningiomas: report of a case and review of the literature. Bilateral radiation-induced meningiomas may occur after radiation therapy or head and neck surgery in previous victims of irradiation. Diagnosis is based on clinical examination with computed tomography and magnetic resonance imaging. Imaging characteristics are tumor extension into the sphenoid sinuses, implantation in the clivus, and hypodensity compared with brain or bone. The rarity of this condition, delays in diagnosis, and the nonspecific clinical presentation require consideration for this diagnosis when meningiomas are found bilaterally in a previously irradiated patient. We present a case of bilateral radiation-induced meningiomas in a 38-year-old man who underwent radiation therapy for squamous cell carcinoma of the head and neck with large doses of radiation (50 Gy). The diagnosis was based on clinical, computed tomography, and magnetic resonance imaging findings. No tumor recurrence was observed 7 years after complete resection. The characteristic imaging findings of radiation-induced meningiomas are described, and a review of the literature is given. Electrophysiological study of an 8-year-old boy showed an electrical inexcitability of the left arm and normal excitability of the left leg muscle. The cardiological examination and sympathetic skin response (SSR) excluded the diagnosis of neurovascular compression syndrome. At the operation a thin filament of Heister with its bifurcation was found in the rectus abdominis muscle, and the segment of the thin filament was excised. He is still under the treatment in the rehabilitation centre./* * Copyright (c) 2014, Oracle and/or its affiliates.
