Effect of alcohol intake and heavy drinking on semen parameters. The influence of alcohol intake and heavy drinking on semen quality was examined in a study involving 931 men aged 20-50 years in a Midwestern city. Semen samples were obtained for analysis at home and the subjects were interviewed using a questionnaire about frequency and quantity of alcohol intake and about a variety of risk factors for sexual dysfunction. Of the 931 men, 23.4% had consumed alcohol at least weekly and 47.3% had been drinking frequently during the previous 6 months. According to the questionnaire, 32.5% had alcohol consumption of less than eight drinks per week. The mean number of drinks per week was 6.8 +/- 4.3 and the mean percent of males reporting daily heavy drinking was 0.9 +/- 1.5%. For the 0-8 drinks/week group, the mean number of drinks per week was 6.2 +/- 4.4. In those less than four drinks per day, spermatazoa concentration (volume x sperm concentration/0.5 x 10(6) cells) was higher (p less than 0.001) and white blood cell count was lower (p less than 0.001) compared to those drinking four or more drinks per day. The difference was not found for sperm motility, percentage of abnormal forms or percent of normally formed spermatazoa. Alcohol consumption of more than four drinks per day was associated with a reduction in sperm concentration (p less than 0.001) and a greater percentage of morphologically abnormal spermatazoa (p less than 0.001) but there was no difference in the other three semen variables. These data suggest that alcohol may adversely affect sperm concentration and the number of normal cells, and that heavy drinking is associated with a reduction in sperm concentration and an increase in morphologically abnormal spermatazoa. This invention relates to a method for the preparation of high purity high molecular weight polyethylene terephthalate copolyesters with a low level of low molecular weight comonomers and to the products made thereby. High molecular weight polyethylene terephthalate is used as a component in various copolymer and polymeric compositions. It is frequently used as a carrier or matrix for fillers in fiber and film forming compositions. The polymer is also suitable for the manufacture of molded articles because of its toughness, solvent resistance and light stability properties. The impact and tensile properties of the compositions are highly dependent on the molecular weight of the polymer. Accordingly, the copolymer or polymerization may affect the properties of a composition containing it. The high molecular weight polyethylene terephthalate is prepared by catalytic condensation of terephthalic acid or an ester thereof with ethylene glycol. The resulting polymer contains a large number of free hydroxyl groups in the polymer backbone. If it is desired to incorporate additional comonomers, a mono- or diester of terephthalic acid, ortho-phthalic acid or another dicarboxylic acid is formed in the reaction. This is then reacted with ethylene glycol. As a consequence of this reaction, the hydroxyl groups of the polymer are esterified with a lower molecular weight dicarboxylic acid or anhydride monomer thereby modifying the properties of the polymer. For example, it is known to prepare high molecular weight copolymer of terephthalic acid and ethylene glycol with a mixture of ethylene glycol monomers. European Patent Application 85302932.1 discloses a polymerization process using a mixture of ethylene glycol and glycerol containing from about 1.5 to about 3.5 molar percent of ethylene glycol for the preparation of polyethylene terephthalate. It is further indicated that polyethylene terephthalate formed in this manner is suitable for use in the manufacture of fiber or film forming compositions. European Patent Application 84402476.4 discloses a polymerization process using a mixture of ethylene glycol and one or more of glycerin, a lower aliphatic diol having 1-6 carbon atoms, a diol containing a 10 carbon atom backbone or a tri- or tetra-glycol, where the acid number of the reaction product of these diols is within the
