ISmarts.Eye movements as behavioral measures in autism: can we explain behavior with eye movements? Autism is a neurodevelopmental disorder characterized by social impairments, unusual responses to the environment, and the presence of restricted and repetitive behaviors. Although the presence of impaired eye movements has been reported in autism, there have been few studies directly addressing this issue. The few studies that have examined eye movements in autism have been inconclusive, perhaps in part because of inconsistency in reporting and in the analysis of the data. These inconclusive results may have also arisen from misconceptions that have resulted in a focus on the face or the head in most studies of eye movements in autism, rather than on the eyes. In this article, we review existing studies of eye movements in autism and propose that changes observed in these behaviors may be better explained in terms of visual attention rather than indicating a primary problem with oculomotor control mechanisms. A model is proposed in which the existence of visual scanning abnormalities in autism is demonstrated by examining the distribution of attention, and the variability in these distributions is used to explain the presence of atypical oculomotor behaviors
