Tagging Amazon's drones is such a commonplace event for Amazon and its fuming customers in the United States that the federal government is considering creating a list of other companies who fly drones in America. Since the Thanksgiving holiday, the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) has investigated hundreds of complaints of Amazon drones colliding with airplanes, although the company has made no formal claim that its drones have been involved in any crashes. "We do not investigate collisions between UAS and other manned aircraft or UAS and other unmanned aircraft," a spokesman told The Daily Telegraph. "Please refer to the FAA's reports of these incidents." But the FAA has also received hundreds of complaints about "suspicious" drones which have been following people or causing trouble. The FAA told The Daily Telegraph that it has spoken to Amazon about the alleged crashes. It said the collection of information, so far, has been "useful". "We're working with Amazon to try to resolve the situation," the FAA spokesman said. I would just like to share that it has been settled. We successfully navigated the UAS aspect of the contract, and the "relationship" part continues. "We are disappointed that the FAA deems it necessary to enter into a "relationship" with DJI – rather than finding a resolution through the courts. We are hopeful that the FAA will continue to respect our contracts and cease the investigation, and we have no intention of interfering in DJI's business or disrupting normal drone operations in the industry." A statement from DJI said: "We agree with Amazon that we must maintain the existing approach to the prohibition of operations for aerial delivery. With full autonomy on a UAS, even a few simple mistakes or a mechanical issue could have catastrophic consequences. "We support the FAA, and its specialists, in achieving that goal, while acknowledging that UAS technologies are moving at a fast pace, and we continue to work toward that standard, which is why we said that it's critical to maintain the current approach. "We certainly don't want to pursue a path that would threaten the safety of our customers or the general public." As many as 20 crashes involving drones have been reported in America. The most serious was last month when the craft crashed in front of a police helicopter in Pennsylvania, causing the back of the helicopter
