The decision comes after Apple has asked Japan's office of trademark registration to cancel its trademarks for some of the iOS products. Sony may not be standing idly by though, the office is still waiting for Apple to respond to their request. It's still unclear if Apple is requesting the cancellation of Sony's Japanese trademarks for use with iBooks, the iPhone, iPod touch or iPad. Sony's representatives said the only trademarks that Apple requested to be cancelled were for Sony's iBook line of personal computers. Apple may not have even known about the trademarks, which were registered over two years ago. As soon as Apple responds to the request, Sony will then be able to enforce the trademarks or it may have to rely on a legal action to force Apple to acknowledge it's use of their trademarks. All trademarks that have not been enforced by Sony will expire after two years, therefore the company will be able to continue to enforce their trademark rights for those products that it already owns. Sony may chose not to enforce their trademarks for the iPhone and iPod touch, if Apple agrees to stop using the trademarks. To date, Sony has registered its trademark for the iBook in Japan, in September of 2006. Apple began a trademark process for the iBook in June of 2007 in Japan. While Sony registered for the iBooks, Apple was already registered as the trademark holder for the iBooks and would have also chosen to use the iBook trademark for 648931e174
