Perioperative hydration: what is the evidence? Perioperative or "before" perioperative is a term used in UK anaesthetic practice to cover all the events or procedures before anaesthesia, usually before surgery or injection of medication. Perioperative is also used by other agencies to mean any "before" procedure or care, such as before medical diagnosis, such as in the case of radiotherapy or chemotherapy, or before the operation, such as before induction of anaesthesia. In addition, perioperative is used by various companies to describe their prevention and treatment of the anaesthetic or surgical preparations. This article will summarise the evidence for hydration in patients before and after surgery.

It's all about and, to be honest, I can't think of another science that's attempted to come up with a definition of what the mind is. Or more importantly, what it's not. So where do we draw the line between the mental and the physical? How do we know what we experience is all in our head? One recent study, published in the journal Frontiers in Psychology, has attempted to answer that question. Researchers from Columbia University in New York led by Corina Allen tested the abilities of people with and without schizophrenia to determine what they can and can't do by touching their own face. The group found that those with schizophrenia could see what was happening when they touched their own face, but it appeared to be too difficult for the non-psychotic people to process what was going on. And they were even worse at sensing what people were thinking about them. The team's findings suggest that our brains can be thought of as an "extended sense organ", able to sense touch, pain, mental imagery, and empathy in our own bodies. This research backs up what we see in ourselves - being able to spot facial expressions. We also see people often mistake what someone is thinking of them for their own emotional state. "What you experience is what you get to see and what you get to feel and see in other people." People may see themselves in new situations, to the point that they don't realise that their own "version" of a person has changed. We might feel empathy for an acquaintance of ours, but when asked, we'll come across as cold and distant.
