time? A: The answer is that the program is compiled in 32 bits but the size of each process memory block is 4 KiB. When a process hits the end of the execution buffer (due to the stack overflow) it performs a branch to an invalid address, crashing the whole virtual machine. The simplest solution is to start compilation with 64 bit pointers instead of 32 bits (look for `-m32` on `gcc`), or to change the return address offset to 4 KiB, or to pad the stack to 8 KiB. A: See this SO answer. Basically you can't do what you want in a process whose stack is a 4KiB allocation. That would be a rather large stack. Donald Trump made a big move on Tuesday to attempt to rehabilitate his image as a man “not afraid of a fight” when he unleashed a series of tweets criticising NFL players who “disrespect” the country by kneeling during the national anthem. Mr Trump started the barrage of insults by insisting that NFL commissioner Roger Goodell had told him that he was “unhappy with all of the disrespect... to our country.” The basis of the claim seems to be a letter sent to the president from Mr Goodell which was published on the NFL website, in which the commissioner “made it clear that we are not advocating a specific position on the highly charged political issues of our day.” But Mr Trump then went a step further, tweeting that the players had an “absolute right” to protest during the anthem. However, his argument can be summarised as follows: “They have a right to protest, but they don’t have the right to silence me.” He first posted a video of himself smashing a football over the head of a player who was making a similar protest, and then suggested that this justified the protests being allowed. The video has since been deleted and Mr Trump has now been condemned for violence against sportsmen and women. During the presidential campaign, Mr Trump was the most controversial candidate in American politics, which has been reflected in a disappointing approval rating for him in 1cdb36666d
