Southwest Airlines President Gary Kelly has told the airline to add more capacity to its popular routes in the Chicago area, sources with knowledge of the situation told The Post. As the Chicago-area economy was starting to heat up in the fall, the airline lost a number of passengers who were booking flights before and after the annual Black Friday shopping frenzy, the sources said. Southwest typically adds at least 10 percent to its capacity, and has done so to meet customer demand on routes such as San Antonio to Las Vegas, Chicago to Los Angeles and many others, according to the sources. Kelly, the CEO of the Dallas-based carrier, informed the airline's board late last week that the airline should add more capacity in the Chicago area, said one of the sources. A call to Southwest on Friday was not immediately returned. The airline added more flights to Chicago and increased capacity on flights to Texas on Thursday to appease its customers after the company failed to adequately respond to complaints from angry fliers who were stranded during a six-day ground stop in the middle of the Thanksgiving holiday. Kelly learned of the passenger concerns two weeks ago from the airline's passengers council but waited until after the holiday to bring the issue to the airline's board. Rival Delta was able to quickly add flights and add flights to Chicago after the Black Friday shopping rush, but Southwest was also losing travelers to other carriers because of a lack of flights and overbooked flights. Southwest has been struggling with a loss of both passengers and flights since October, and is already planning to reduce its workforce by about 1,200 employees. When the reduction plan was first announced in May, Kelly told the airline's board that he was working with the union to save up to 8,000 jobs. Kelly, who joined Southwest in 2002, was unable to immediately be reached for comment. Crain's Chicago Business first reported that Kelly spoke to airline officials last
