Nursing care quality is an important component of patient care. Action research is a research methodology designed to improve the quality of care services through the exploration of care processes and evaluation of care. This study examined the effectiveness of three specific action research projects in one Wisconsin nursing home to improve quality of nursing care for older adults with dementia. In this three-year, multiple-case study, qualitative and quantitative data were collected and analyzed for each of the three action research projects undertaken in the nursing home. Using the Quality Nursing Care Model as the theoretical framework, data on patient outcomes, activities of daily living, patient satisfaction, quality improvement initiatives, and patient safety were collected. This study provides proof of concept that improvement in the quality of nursing care is possible. However, organizational culture and power dynamics must be addressed in order to sustain improvements in care quality. This study highlights the need for nursing administrators to become involved in quality improvement initiatives and to define strategic plans to help ensure the successful implementation of action research projects for the care of patients with dementia.Q: Mapping Multiple Values for Enum Fields Using Hibernate I have an XML file that I am reading in and then decoding to convert it into an object using Hibernate. This is sometimes called "single line printing." Sometimes there is a need to print images or photographs, or to print more than one line at a time. With the advent of inkjet printers, and in particular inkjet printers which use piezoelectric elements as ink jetting devices, a method of printing with nozzles has been developed in which a print head with a row of nozzles is moved relative to a row of printing media. The print head can be moved either from side to side, or from the front to the rear (or vice versa) to make contact with the paper once per row of nozzles. Even though this method of printing with multiple passes, (a series of passes each including printing one row, and then a pass in which each row is printed one after the other), is much faster than a method of printing with one pass of the print head over a row of printing media, and thus more efficient, it is still desirable to have even more efficiency.using System;
