Paths and vector drawing Paths are a set of instructions that tell a graphics program how to draw an image or object. Here is an outline drawing of a tree: Paths can be converted to or from a sequence of pixels. Graphic programs allow creating and editing paths that can be applied to a graphic at any scale to produce a result that looks like a photograph. Vector programs can be used to create scalable graphics — they store the information used to create an image without file size restrictions, so the amount of data used can grow or shrink as the image size does.

Proteomic profiling of IgG-derived phosphopeptides from Phlebotomus duboscqi sand fly salivary glands. Arthropod saliva is an important vector-borne pathogen interface, containing several proteins that play a role in infection, immunity and other biological processes. Phosphorylation is the most common type of post-translational modification. The present study describes the first characterization of an arthropod vector's salivary gland proteome by means of a targeted (immuno)proteomic approach in which the corresponding phosphopeptides are isolated. Salivary glands from the adult sand fly Phlebotomus duboscqi were isolated in saline solution and were treated with a specific phosphatase. Phosphorylated peptides were resolved by LC-MS/MS, followed by database search and protein identification. From the 1089 identified proteins, 19 phosphorylated serine, threonine and tyrosine were identified. Western blot analyses using specific antibodies validated the presence of Phosphoprotein phosphatase (PPP), serine/threonine-specific protein phosphatase (STEP) and acid phosphatase PHOS-1 in the salivary glands. The identified proteins could be grouped into several functional categories, including proteolysis, synthesis and/or processing, metabolism, signaling and secretion/exocytosis. Furthermore, the composition of this salivary gland proteome appears to be highly different from that of the non-phosphorylated counterpart. The data provide novel clues to the biology of phlebotomine sand flies, with the identification of novel putative signaling and/or patterning molecules and their potential use for controlling these disease vectors.

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a technique for reading position information out of a disc-like recording medium.
2. Description of the Prior Art Information recording mediums have been known which comprise a pair of substrate discs (hereinafter referred to simply as disc) which are arranged to face each other with a gap therebetween and which contain information recorded thereon by a recording and reproducing head. Examples of such information recording mediums include a magnetic disc. In operation, a predetermined electrical signal is produced from a driving system at a predetermined position of the information recording medium which is the medium to be played, and the reproduced signal is supplied to a signal processing circuit which is arranged in the driving system. The signal processing circuit processes
