The lung is exposed to cigarette smoke (CS). Mucosa-associated lymphoid tissue (MALT) is involved in innate and adaptive immune responses and is known to be important for CS-induced lung inflammation and cancer. The use of IgA or IgG isotypes of antibodies (Abs) as therapeutics has been shown to be effective in a variety of diseases, including allergies, chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, and asthma. In the present study, we developed Abs to specific epitopes of mucosal antigens of lung tissue. In particular, we generated anti-Sm and anti-mucin 1 Abs, which are known to mediate MALT lymphomagenesis. We used a phage-display library to screen with the lung tissue antigen extract as the screening antigen. The identified scFv clones were expressed as human monoclonal Abs (huMAB) and introduced into mice by a human Ig transgenesis system. Antigen-specific huMABs were identified by an ELISA assay using the corresponding antigen, and the functional activity was determined by their ability to bind lung tissue extracts. The huMABs were further assayed for their ability to bind to bronchial epithelia of control and CS-exposed mice. We succeeded in isolating anti-Sm Abs, which recognized an epitope on a surface protein of the Sm-superantigen complex. On the other hand, we isolated an anti-mucin 1 Abs from a phage display library with the use of a lung tissue extract as the screening antigen. Antigen-specific huMABs were
