While browsing through Meta, there was a question about the right etiquette for private communication, more specifically, a question about private communication on a community outside of Stack Exchange. My question here stems from the personal nature of the communication. Should the conversation be publicly accessible through the post history? A: That's only a private matter between you and the other user, and the community should not see it. In this case, it's a private message in a chat room. You don't want the chat room community to know about the private discussion because: It's a private matter between you and the other user; it's not the community's concern. You don't want the community to know about it because it's a private matter. It can have negative consequences for both you and the other user. The other user can cause trouble for you. From their point of view, it's very embarrassing, and they don't want it to be known that they have a problem. It can cause the community to be confused, especially if the other user posts very incoherent messages that are hard to understand. The user's reputation will be damaged because of this, and the community will worry about it. A: Yes: private matters should never leave the community. If you only expect a private message back and don't expect anything else from the other person, you can delete your message. If you send a message to a user and expect a response, you can send a "post to chat" message and open a private message window with that user. If you expect a more substantial response, flag it. If you are unsure if a response is expected or not, post it to chat. You may find that the other person does not respond, and if that's the case, you can delete the message. If you absolutely must have it private, you can always write your private message in a way that makes it private. This is called a spoiler tag. I used them a lot in mine, and it's easy: [spoiler text] If a future reader doesn't see the text in the spoiler tag, they will never know the contents of the
