Ryanair's fliers have been in for a surprise following the airline's press release earlier this week revealing its new aircraft livery. The new design includes a dark grey tone across the base of its Boeing 737s – including the cockpit, the flight deck and the wing pylons – and an olive-brown stripe, which encompasses the fuselage sides, doors, trays, lavatories and loading bridge. The new livery, which has replaced the previous one of grey and silver on the ground with a design of simply grey and silver, has been a hit in public opinion – with many saying that the current dark grey “looks sick”. However, some have pointed out that the new livery looks a bit “fake”. “It does have a built in camouflage,” said Dr David Faulkner, of the University of East Anglia's Norwich Medical School. “That's the design – I mean look at the doors, they are a flush door rather than a flush door”. Nonsense, says Irish airline Ryanair. “We are not the first company to have developed what we call a ‘camouflage coat’. Camouflage is a feature of nature and which has been built into certain animals for many generations. “The airline industry is a totally man-made business,” said Ryanair chief executive Michael O’Leary. “People forget, Ryanair was founded more than a decade ago and we have plenty of former Navy pilots among our staff.” “And that's before we had the entire ocean in front of us where we could design our own camouflage.” Dr Faulkner then points to the windows on Ryanair's fleet of Boeing 737s. “Window design has changed completely. The old windows had very big outside edges and notches or cuts right inside the window and it was easier for an air traffic controller to spot a plane. Now the windows have very nice smooth edges right across and you couldn't see a plane unless you really looked. And even then you might not notice it,” he said. Ryanair has rubbished these claims as well. “An aircraft that looks like a large grey stone, with glass windows from the side, it is absolutely impossible to spot a
