It also includes creative features, such as the ability to apply photographic adjustments (see Figure 7-20) and to provide a tool for artistic creativity (see Figure 7-21). One example is the ability to synchronize the settings of multiple layers, which allows a group of layers to have the same adjustment applied to them. Many people prefer the convenience of this feature when working with multiple layers. One of the most popular features of Elements is the ability to create a custom workspace. Q: C++ : Is it possible to have a variable of type const std::function? First of all, the code that is provided is a student's final project. So it is of great importance that this is answered. I have a class member int which takes a std::function as its data. class Class1 { int f(int x) { return x*x; } int g() { return f(10); } public: Class1(){} // Define a member function int compute(std::function &); } int Class1::compute(std::function &compute_Func) { // fill in the definition of the function to be used with compute. // THIS IS WHAT I DONT KNOW cout<&. (The reason is that the data member function is responsible for any modification that it makes, and I don't want the user to be able to modify it. Hence, this is so.) Can it be done? Thank you in advance. A: Firstly, you have to qualify the function and use std::bind to encapsulate the passed function: int Class1::compute(std::function &compute_Func) { // fill in the definition of the function to be used with compute. // THIS IS WHAT I DONT KNOW cout<& The explicit syntax of std::bind

-alpha is considered to be a key mediator in the pathogenesis of RA \[\[B24]\]. It is believed that TNF- α would be involved in synovial inflammation and destruction of cartilage and bone. Blocking TNF- α with neutralising antibodies or its soluble receptor significantly reduced joint inflammation in models of RA \[\[B24]\]. There are two forms of recombinant soluble TNF receptor, TNF-sR55 and TNF-sR75. Both of these are able to prevent synovial inflammation and joint damage in animal models of RA but only TNF-sR75 has been shown to be an effective treatment in humans \[\[B25], \[\[B26]\]. IL-1 is another important cytokine that is involved in inflammation. It is produced by many cell types in the body including monocytes, macrophages, and synovial fibroblasts. It is known to be a potent inflammatory cytokine that plays an important role in the activation of the immune system and in the repair of damaged tissue. However, overproduction of IL-1 can lead to a number of inflammatory responses including chronic inflammation and an impaired immune response. Therefore, the inhibition of IL-1 has a beneficial effect on the treatment of RA. IL-6 is a proinflammatory cytokine that is produced mainly by monocytes, fibroblasts, and osteoblasts and regulates cell growth, differentiation, and function. Serum IL-6 levels have been associated with disease activity and damage in RA \[\[B27]\]. IL-6 can stimulate the production of acute phase reactants, especially CRP. Moreover, IL-6 production can also be stimulated by certain cytokines such as IL-1 and TNF- α \[\[B28]\]. Thus, inhibition of IL-6 may have positive effects on the management of RA by decreasing inflammatory biomarkers and reducing disease activity. IL-17 is a proinflammatory cytokine that is produced by T helper 17 cells, and it has been identified as a link between innate and adaptive immunity \[\[B29]\]. It was originally discovered as a factor produced by activated T cells, and it is considered to be one of the major regulatory cytokines responsible for chronic inflammation and tissue damage in many autoimmune and inflammatory disorders \[\[B29]\]. IL-17 and its receptor have been found to
