The B7-2 and CD28 molecules are the two co-stimulatory ligands which exist on the surface of activated lymphocytes. The CD28 molecule acts as an adhesion molecule, while B7-2 transduces a signal necessary for T-cell activation. We examined the expression of B7-2 and CD28 molecules using a panel of monoclonal antibodies in the human fetal lymphoid organs. B7-2 and CD28 molecules were first detected in the thymus at the early stage of organogenesis (9 weeks of gestation), suggesting a role of B7-2 and CD28 molecules in establishing the thymic environment. At the end of organogenesis, the expression of B7-2 and CD28 molecules was observed in the human fetal lymphoid organs, and the cells in the Peyer's patches of the small intestine had both B7-2 and CD28 molecules on their surface. The lymphocytes in the gut-associated lymphoid tissues were detected to express B7-2 and CD28 molecules during the later stages of gestation. These results suggest that both B7-2 and CD28 molecules are involved in the maintenance and/or function of the lymphoid tissue, not only in the thymus, but also
