Getting Started (Here They Are) Did you miss out on the public beta? Whether you've been a part of the feedback loop from the beginning or just woke up this morning to find that the public beta is now available, the Play Store has received a significant update. The biggest addition in the release is the Quick Search bar, which you can access from the top of the store, just like the regular search bar. If you want to check out the new version, you'll need to make sure that you have a Google account linked to your handset as Google will take an increased amount of information from your profile. That's all the technical stuff out of the way, let's see what's new in the Play Store 8! Quick Search The major addition to the store is the Quick Search bar, which allows you to search for apps and games without switching to the full interface. Simply type some text into the search bar and you'll be able to instantly find the search results. After searching, you'll be presented with the relevant apps and games that fit the search term. It's different from the regular search bar because it only shows you relevant results to what you typed, it's limited to 50 results at the moment but it's already more useful than the standard Android method of searching. There's no option to search between different categories, so it's a bit limited in usefulness. If you can think of an alternative, let us know in the comments! Clear all notifications In the interests of keeping app updates separate from the ones that you get from your favourite companies, you'll be able to opt to clear out all notifications from the Play Store completely. Go to Settings > Apps and toggle the icon to the right of the app tile to clear all notifications. You'll now only get push notifications for apps that you've updated since the previous update and updates that you've approved. Even if you have an app on your phone that you don't mind having notifications for, it means that you won't get that little orange button in the lower left corner to update it at all. If you're a heavy user of the store, it will make it easier to filter out all of the bullshit that you don't care about. Note: This is
