"I am really excited about the new HyperMotion Technology that enables players to define their own skills, tactics and play style," said Alex Hunter, FIFA franchise director. "By using players' data from an exciting football match in motion-capture suits, FIFA 22 brings the game closer to reality." Hunter explained that "FIFA 22's hyper-responsive gameplay was a passion project from day one. And the progress and dedication of the teams behind it has been nothing short of inspiring," he added. "Now that the game is in development, we can start collaborating with gameplay designers to make FIFA the best football experience yet." Check out the demo of FIFA 22's HyperMotion Technology via EA's official website here. "FIFA 22 improves the ball physics, control and balance of football," EA Sports engineer Dr. James Randall explained in the FIFA blog post. "We're improving how the ball behaves and that includes creating a more authentic dynamic feel from play." Added lead gameplay designer Dan Brown: "The real footballers guide the real ball, giving it all the right physical and psychological characteristics, so that the game is as authentic as possible. Each move the player makes has an effect on the ball and the ball's movement can feel different depending on the context." Take a look at the improved ball physics in FIFA 22 in the video below. "We know that players get the most enjoyment when they can play 'how they play,' so we're constantly working on improving and expanding the current player models and animations to create a next generation of truly authentic and exciting FIFA gameplay," went on Randall. "We're also carefully improving every aspect of the physics engine to ensure it meets our high expectations of player control and simulation." EA's FIFA blog explained: "With FIFA 22's new computerised physics engine, you'll feel the speed of the ball, and also the weight and power of it too. Players in the air retain the flick of the ball required in real life and tackle the ball just like a real player would. What's more, the ball feels heavier and more powerful when it moves through the air, making it a real challenge for players to hit it accurately, despite the accuracy ratings on the game." In its FIFA blog post, EA explained that
