So, hot topic of the month and it is time for me to raise a flag. Where was I? Oh yes, Loony-o. I use to speak to someone on the line for some help with the Unity3D for Windows 7. He actually went further and installed Windows 7 on a quad core that was running Windows XP. He was later told that Windows 7 had just gone for a repair. Why? Because the computer had crashed and taken the data with it. When the crashed computer was supposed to come back it didn't. Turns out it was corrupted (not talking the quad core, but the single core). So the Microsoft repairs did what it did best, get a new computer in and it was running Windows 7. So, why am I raising a flag here? On a quad core working on Windows 7 you will notice that the processor seems to stick at a single core. Your PC will also seem slower. Why is that? Windows 7 needs more power. Now, the term "stuck" might be a little much here but a quad core with one core free is not happy. If you notice the "Uptime" under Activity Monitor is what is interesting. You will notice that the problem does not always occur. You can have a quad core running Windows 7 well. If you reboot a few times and try to get back into Unity3D you will notice it "freezes". It seems to be again related to the number of cores available. A lot of time the quad core will actually sit on all four cores. If you do a little research I have found this to be more than likely a Graphics card problem. So, if you are finding Unity3D running slow go ahead and open the control panel and move the Graphics settings to the highest level available. I will be doing a video on this topic at some point and would love to have a few people watching.
