Descargar Generalissimo: Jefe de Ejército. When asked why he's so interested in Sweden, Spillane tells THR the obvious: They have the highest rate of new HIV infections in Europe, which he says deserves the world's attention. "HIV-infected women are about three times more likely than women in the rest of Europe to get pregnant, sometimes with fatal results for them and the fetus," he says. "Those are legitimate target populations and epidemic in scale." Sapir notes that Swedes are no strangers to sharing their alcohol or drugs. "Swedes have a great reputation," he says. "That's probably why, as poor countries, they like to consume the equivalent of a whole bottle of wine each and every day. I don't think it's an attitude that's conducive to STIs." The entire spectrum of STIs is epidemic in Sweden, according to the country's sex education program. The government is promoting condom use among prostitutes, and Spillane says programs in some areas of the country are making that kind of work easier. However, says Spillane, "The Swedish government is really into prevention," and a national campaign has been launched to teach the public about the many harms of unprotected sex. On the whole, Spillane is looking forward to working with the Swedish. "I'm very excited about the opportunity to work in that country," he says. "I think we'll have a lot of challenges, but I think it's a productive challenge." Sapir adds that Swedes are more likely to work on prevention than most other Europeans. "We have tried to educate people at many levels," he says, "and we have to figure out what's most effective." The incidence of STIs is rising faster in Sweden than anywhere else in Europe, with HIV infections increasing by 27 percent and the rate of syphilis at the highest level since a Swedish government survey began in the 1980s. The statistics are stunning. Swedish men have sex with an average of four or five women per year. That means about 14,000 to 15,000 sexual encounters per year for a male Swedish citizen. One in three of them will, of course, contract an STI. That means it's 30 to 32 percent. Swedish men are also more likely to practice unprotected sex than men in the rest
