Here's the transcript of his response to one of the questions. Charlie Baker: Yes, it is disappointing. It makes it harder for us to do what we've done in Massachusetts. That was the initial plan, and it was the one that was largely the foundation of the cost. We've tried very hard to go with the path that was laid down. I'd like to talk about the specifics. Start with the taxes, the excise tax on insurance. One of the things that people found most objectionable was the excise tax on insurance. The excise tax on insurance amounted to $300 million for our system of health care, a fraction of 1% of the federal insurance tax bill. In a very competitive market, no matter what kind of reform is done, the people will have options and employers will have options in terms of a different way of providing insurance. If you have to pay $300 million, and others pay none, it was a loss. There are a couple of other things. First was the second year of the excise tax on health plans that amount to about $200 million. That is also a drop in the bucket, so the impact of that excise tax is low. There are other things that were charged to the Commonwealth. It was the 2.3 billion in the budget over 10 years, the repeal of the 3.25 percentage of salary deduction, the 2.25 percent payroll tax that can be refunded, and many other things. The impact is low in the big picture. Had we not been successful in our effort to reform our health care system, we would have had a rate that was unsustainable for us 648931e174
