What is the difference between window.location.href and location.href? When I change window.location.href, it updates the browser's location field correctly. However when I use location.href the browser does not change the url location. Please explain to me why this is happening. A: The reason why location.href and window.location.href are not the same is because the first one will try to get the URL using the web browser's settings. The second one will try to get the URL from the site. Say your page A is a simple page that looks like this: $(document).ready(function() { var url = window.location.href; console.log('url is'+ url); }) Link to SomeHost The console.log will show that this is what is in the url field. A: Because the purpose of location.href is to check the browser location property instead of the window location as window.location.href. They differ in that the value they return is 1cdb3666d

Three-dimensional diffusion-weighted imaging (3D-DWI) is widely used to visualize intratumoral vessels in brain tumors, including typical vascular malformations and low-grade gliomas. However, the usefulness of this technique in other pediatric brain tumors and its value in intratumoral edema has not been described. We therefore performed 3D-DWI in patients with various primary brain tumors and studied the correlation between the apparent diffusion coefficient (ADC) values measured by 3D-DWI and the pathophysiologic characteristics of the tumors and edema. We analyzed 8 children with different primary brain tumors who had undergone a 3T MRI study including conventional sequences and diffusion-weighted imaging (DWI) (b = 0, 500, and 1000 s/mm²). ADC was measured in regions of interest (ROIs) placed in the edema and in tumor lesions. Histology and clinical data were available in all cases. Apparent diffusion coefficient values were measured in tumors and edema and compared using t test and Pearson's r correlation. The ADC value was higher in the edema than in the tumor lesions (P
