But, in a rigorous sense, it is very easy for me to give an example of a linear space under a reasonable operation (like addition or multiplication) which is not group, but it is very hard for me to define group when I mean the concept in a rigorous sense. A: While there is no natural category of groups, there is an appropriate category of groups with similar behavior, namely the category of groups with a homomorphism  $h : G \rightarrow H$  to an appropriate class  $H$  of groups. The key point of groups is the unit, that is why it is enough to have just one single Featherlight is a very promising and unique solution for a system and data security. It means you get many levels of a defense against malware and can use both on-access and on-demand scanning.

Featherlight is a complex system in many respects, but that does not interfere with functionality. All components can be easily managed by means of a set of options and tools. The essence of this solution is in its directory of security settings. You need to analyze and decide which options to use depending on the security of your system. During the execution of a program, each component periodically checks if it was modified, if a reference to it was added or deleted, and if the file is active or outdated. This information is stored in a secure repository. There are several security levels - all protections are based on signatures and do not require CPU power. The engine operates on the principle of a semaphore. But, unlike a traditional one, Featherlight uses a special version that allows a completely different approach to the protection of your system. It uses the inter-component communications (downloading and uploading of objects) to decide whether there is a change in a file or in the registry, and, if a security threat is detected, it stops the system from access to that file or registry key. The engine of Featherlight protects against both known and unknown threats. Its key component of detection is an engine of universal detection. It works on the basis of a signature that is known. It is the basis of the antivirus check. The universal detection engine is complemented by the system of specific protection. It works on the basis of the file name, the repository location, the location in the registry, and other criteria. The system can be managed by means of a set of simple tools. You can configure that each component of the engine has its own access. You can also configure the system that any component may be configured to use two engines. There is a difference between logging and reporting. If it is necessary to start these components (or change them), you can schedule them. In the tool section, you can schedule the check of the engine. You can schedule a complete cleaning of the system when a scheduled event takes place. You can run different programs on this engine, including program for cleaning the system, or use it to control files and folders. You can configure various levels of access to the system, and you can limit access only to the network
