The Baltimore City Police Department—which is being sued for allegedly overzealous policing tactics which led to the death of Freddie Gray in the back of a police van—is making news for one reason this week: Their chief is telling the public he has no plans to resign. Former Baltimore cop and possible mayoral candidate David B. Murray told the Baltimore Sun that he would "absolutely" stay on as chief, despite being under fire for the high number of homicides in the city and for following Gray's death with the kind of policing that is in the spotlight now. "I know the Board of Police Commissioners and I believe they're trying to do what's best for the city, but I also believe the people of this city expect me to answer for the job," Murray said. The Police Board's choice to fire Chief Anthony W. Batts came just two weeks after an investigation by the U.S. Justice Department found that the department's practices are "deeply rooted in a culture of force and control" and that officers are "routinely" abusing their authority. "Supervisors routinely direct, control, manipulate, and use their subordinates, even coercing them to use inappropriate force and engage in unconstitutional conduct," the federal investigation said in a 41-page report. "Police supervisors are not held accountable for the unlawful conduct of their subordinates." One officer told investigators that the department believed officers were like
