The Skype Sidetone program adds the sound of your voice to your headset. So if you use a headset, and you shout to talk to a person without the use of the “side tone” function, you sound like you are talking in a wind tunnel. The Skype Sidetone program will fix that.

One problem with the side tone function is that you won't know if it is working until you make a call, and then have the caller not understand you. This program fixes that problem. To use, select the side tone controls, and Click "Apply". Then, Click "Test". If the side tones worked, a small audio icon should show up at the bottom right of the Skype window. is highlighted. To “Recompile and apply”, select the Sidetone and Click “Recompile and Apply”. The icon should change and indicate that it is working. This application must be recompiled each time you restart Skype. How to do that? When Skype starts up, it is suspended by Windows. This allows Skype to pass a parameter to the system when it starts. Open Skype, go to Options -> Preferences. Click Skype Compatibility, and set the "Enforce compatibility with newer Skype" option. Click OK. Then, delete all copies of the old Skype components. Start a new copy of Skype, and it will use the new version. Note that this overwrites any Skype settings you might have previously saved. Close Skype and delete all components of the Skype program.

When Skype is closed, the config files are deleted. When you run Skype again, these files get created. Set the volume to about 25% in Skype, and try the Side Tone controls. When you are satisfied, set the volume back to where it was. Make sure it is set to 0 in Skype. Now, let's turn to the status bar. Right click on the bar, and select Properties. Make sure Side Tone is not checked. Save the configuration by clicking OK. You can close Skype. When you start it up next time, it will have the side tone settings you just set. If it doesn't, Skype is not using your Sidetone settings. That is OK. Click the Audio Tab, select the Sidetone, and then Compile and Apply. What the Sidetone does is add your voice to the background. This is great for phones and other applications. The side tone

To use it, go into the “Options” of Skype. When the List Tones, “High Pass” and “Low Pass” options appear, you can activate this application. I had enabled the Low Pass option, and activated the Sidetone application. #3 In a Lab #4 In real life you were too young / stupid / busy to put together a wireless repeater device yourself. Well, I got that one. I bought a spare TI-84+ every year since they were first available, so they must be reliable enough to replace an older model. But I also bought a wireless repeater since having free voice to free voice calls from on board computers is fine, but no one wants to send data over, ever. #### What's New In Skype Sidetone?

Go to the Skype application and select "Application Options..." from the menu. Then, go to "Settings -> Audio." Under "A-Gain," turn "Auto Gain" to "On." Next, turn "Side Tones" "On" and "Cutoff" and "Normal." Leave "Skype Auto Gain" checked, and turn "Loud" to "On." This will cause the "A-Gain" to send 32 KHz of 16,000 Hz sound to your headset from the "Microphone" device on Skype. This has the effect of increasing the volume of your normal voice. The website is silent on which Skype device works best. I tested the "Mumble" setting; it is not as effective as the "Microphone" setting on Skype. If the "Skype AutoGain" feature is turned off, Skype will use its own A-Gain method. What the new Sidetone feature is doing is to provide more "touch-back" to the conversation. Because they do not "hear", your voice is sent through the High Frequency (HF) / Range of Voices (RoV) filters. What Sidetone is doing is that, instead of sending Skype's own A-Gain, it is building a "low-pass" filter to balance it out and remove the noise of the conversation. When you are not using the low-pass side tone, Skype will use its own audio processing. With Skype's "A-Gain" you can also use the Skype Mute option if you get tired or annoyed by having to adjust your level. Notes Note that the Sidetone applications are Windows only and Skype is Mac only.

Sidetone does not solve the problem entirely. You can still be heard at the party, but not always your best self. In a meeting, you might be quite content to be quiet and let others speak. But, when you are participating in a conversation, you may be frustrated by the muted, low audio volume. In fact, you may not even be aware that you are not at your best. I hear one person, and then a Skype Sidetone pops out of the noise and fills the silence with your voice. It is only temporary, but the person I was speaking to may have never heard the voice that was speaking to her, unless she turned her head to the side. Otherwise, the conversation was silenced. This
