Nanostructure-mediated molecular imaging of noninvasively targeted tumors with iron oxide-containing magnetic nanoparticles. The spatial localization of nanoparticles within in vivo tumors was investigated using a commercial M(2)T2 relaxometry system. The contrast provided by this system was compared to un-targeted nanoparticles, a protocol that involved an active monoclonal antibody targeting the Her2/neu receptor, and the standard conventional contrast agent gadolinium diethylenetriaminepentaacetic acid. The ability of this technique to image the biological response induced by these three contrasts was assessed in a murine model of mammary carcinoma.
