The new system will benefit those of you who play on Fifa 17 where you may often come up against players who appear to be an inch or so above the pitch while those of you who play on Fifa 18 may be constantly fighting to get by the player who appears to be two inches above the pitch. HMT technology alone doesn't guarantee you a successful pass into the goal mouth, but as it is combined with some really nifty new physics, you'll find you can get some lovely soft goals. The new physics The most immediately noticeable change is how the ball behaves on the pitch. The ball is sticky. You'll notice the team-mates are dragging it out of their feet when making a pass. Now, after that drag, the ball applies drag. And then, after that drag, it rebounds. Those other long-range passes don't bounce as much. This new physics makes it very important that you time your passes correctly. It won't be fun to time a perfectly placed 'dobra' pass as it bounces right back to your opponents feet before it hits the ground, so you need to be sure to pass the ball as it is about to drop. We're talking about too-hard-for-beginners physics. Like this. Smart Goals and Transitions Fifa 22 Full Crack's midfield AI is smart. It knows how to read the play. It doesn't just rely on when it can press the ball with someone in the most strategically important central position, as we saw in FIFA 17. The midfield AI is smart about when it sits off the ball, when it makes a balanced pass or kicks the ball long. Here's an example. The midfield AI controls the ball on the edge of the box. In this example, the AI is controlled by the player on the right-hand side of the picture. The ball is controlled by the player on the right-hand side of the picture. The AI releases the ball. Now, it is controlled by the player on the left-hand side of the picture. The AI releases the ball. This is too perfect. Even though the AI is controlled by the player on the left-hand side of the picture, the ball went exactly where
