I'm running into limits on how many mysqld will allow to happen within a short period of time. For example: XClient can open a total of 30 connections to the database. Each connection (Client) can perform a total of 30 transactions. Each transaction (Client) can take a maximum of 1 second to complete. Running EXPLAIN for a query will show that 30 distinct connections have been initiated, but running mysqlnd_trans_status shows 30 transactions have been queued, and only one is being executed. When I first started using transactions, I was told that mysql was slowing down so much as the number of connections increased that I should consider reducing the size of MySQL transactions. Is that true? Can I configure MySQL to handle my transactions as efficiently as possible? A: You might want to scale your transactions per second by setting up more connections, not transactions per connection. If you have multi-statement transactions, some will be executed per connection (at least in some databases), some per statement and others per transaction. A: Connections, I think, are actually split per transaction, not per statement. Explanation here
