FIFA 20 Advanced 3D Motion Capture | (Media Molecule) We thought it would be fun to put our FIFA technical team and three of the most dedicated community members from Europe through a very intense 16-hour day of gameplay capturing and motion analysis to show how we developed some of the behaviours and animations of the player on an intuitive and accurate level. FIFA 20 Signing Day | (segar, film) The day starts at 8am as we begin with a player signing off camera for a few minutes. At 9am we start recording with the professional player through player's motion capture suits. We record several hours of footage. We start with a split-screen view from the full-body capture suit. Then when we progress, we progress up to a full-body capture suit where we record clips in front, behind and all around the player. We also record the motion capture suits with a motorised turntable. This gets us a huge amount of data in terms of positional and orientation data for each joint and body part. The captures are done in the same manner as FIFA 19, with the same skeleton models and poses that the player will be using. For this technique to work though, we had to create some new poses in order to match these new animations. We then translated these captures to match the full body captures. From the full body captures we rotate the character to the player's body and make them 'dance' and move around a certain way and record that with the player's new skeleton. From there we manipulate this data and we create a skeleton for the new animation. Using the skeleton, we fine tune and manipulate the movement animation. We then take this animation and our previous bones to our final export, which is our animation recording. This process of capture and data manipulation is the same for every player. We currently have a total of 912 animations that we are exporting into the game from this new capture of a complete, high-intensity match. this is the same technique as was used in FIFA 19 and we have the technology to do this new capture and save data quicker than we did in the past. This data collection
