Edition. Online communication has long been available over digital communication networks such as the internet or World Wide Web (WWW). In early applications, online communication was primarily used to conduct a search and retrieve information about data, such as may be found in search engines of the sort that are now common on the web. Such search engines make information stored locally available, and are good at finding information of a particular sort, such as pages that may have pages with content of interest to a person. In contrast to searches for information, which largely focus on a text search for particular keywords or phrases, social media services have gained in popularity because they are good at enabling online communication. These services allow users to connect with friends or to find people with similar interests and engage in activities, including exchanging messages to express their thoughts. People use such services to share information (e.g., pictures, links to other web pages, videos, etc.), express opinions, and for many other purposes. Examples of social media services include Facebook® of Facebook, Inc. of Palo Alto, Calif., Twitter® of Twitter, Inc. of San Francisco, Youtube® of Google Inc. of Mountain View, Calif., and Pinterest® of San Francisco, Calif. The development of social media and the accompanying improvements in online communication has led to the advent of online communities. Online communities are types of social media that share resources such as information, news, announcements, events, and capabilities, among other things. Online communities enable online communication among a large number of people, thus providing a platform for sharing information. Online communities are becoming increasingly popular. As a consequence of the continued popularity of online communities, it is increasingly difficult for users to stay up to date on what is going on in their online communities.
