Grey matter (GM) fibre tracts are affected in a variety of neurodegenerative disorders. This study aimed to study whether there was a consistent distribution of GM properties in the brain and whether this varied with age. The myelin water fraction (MWF) was measured, using the multi-component model, in cortical and subcortical regions from 41 scans of young subjects (age range 12-19 years) and in the entire brain from 15 scans of elderly subjects (age range 80-102 years). The results showed that there were significant differences in MWF with age, and between the sexes, in a number of regions, including the prefrontal cortex, the temporal and parietal association cortices, the left hippocampus, the brainstem and the cerebellum. Cortical parahippocampal, hippocampal and posterior cingulate regions, and subcortical regions in the right caudate and the bilateral thalami were more WMF in the elderly. These results indicate that the distribution of GM properties is regionally heterogeneous and that the ageing effect may be strong, especially in the fibre tracts. The results also suggest that studies are needed for the effect of sex on the distribution of GM properties.Why Go, Are You Ready To Make A Big Decision?
