the problem is that not all torrent sites are as legal as they appear. thepiratebay (or tpb) may claim to offer free access to a huge number of movies, television shows, and other multimedia, but it also allows people to upload files containing harmful code known as malware. in fact, many of the files on tpb include such malware, and users can browse the site at their own risk. the lesser-known kickasstorrents, while somewhat legal in itself, was also the site of a security breach in 2014 which resulted in the leaking of a database containing the personal details of over 23 million users, and that was not enough to get the site kicked off the internet completely. for a service which is primarily available via the dark web, this data is incredibly valuable. when you use a torrent site you are choosing to share and download copyrighted content. it is therefore important to look for public trackers to share files instead of private trackers to track files. public trackers are hosted by many different locations, providing anonymity to the people who use them. this is because anyone with access to a web server or a mirror can put the files up, providing anonymity. if the torrent site is private, you are trusting a third-party to host the tracker, and there is a chance they will shut it down and prevent your access to files. some public trackers are also far less secure than others. this is because people don't know who is behind them. thepiratebay, for example, is a public tracker, meaning people can get onto it without having to supply a username or password. however, by joining, they are more exposed to security risks. thepiratebay has long been under suspicion for not being the most secure tracker. its users can sometimes be tricked into downloading malware, and the site has attracted cybercriminals.
